Welcome Alumni!

My dear Fellow Alumni:

Again it is a privilege to welcome you to the campus of the University on the occasion of our homecoming. We trust you will meet here many of your old friends and enjoy a great football game.

In a world disrupted by war we appreciate more than ever before the opportunity to meet and communicate with friends of our college days. Today, many of our friends are scattered to the four corners of the earth, fighting for the very existence of our country. We remember affectionately those who are absent who are daring to risk their lives in defense of liberty. Let us breathe a silent prayer for their safe return to home and native land when this war shall have ended.

Mrs. Donovan and I extend to you a cordial invitation to drop in at Maxwell Place when the game is over that we may greet you and express our appreciation of your presence on the campus.

War and Football

By IRV KUPCINE

Prominent Sportswriter and Football Official

It was World War I, which now looks like a minor skirmish by comparison, that gave football its greatest impetus. Our boys returned to civilian life eager for a vigorous, body-contact sport that was in keeping with their military training. Football filled that need. And now World War II has quieted the "over-emphasis hecklers" and substantiated the claims football's supporters made for the game.

Aside from the physical developments, which we shall treat presently, football is closely related to war in its strategies and maneuvers. Both are exacting sciences. Even some of the terms are similar. The attack by air is comparatively new in warfare. But not so in football; not, in fact, since that memorable day in 1914 when two youngsters, Knute Rockne and Gus Dorais, forward-passed Notre Dame to a stunning victory over a great Army team. An army's flanking movement is, boiled down to football terminology, an "end run." War stresses the speedy attack at a vulnerable point. Football does the same. War strategy dictates getting the "mostest there firstest." Standard football plays are based on this same precept, with interference rapidly forming to lead the ball carrier to the point of attack. That, too, brings to mind the "convoy," as interferers "convoy" the ball-carrier down the field.

Thus any youth who has played football under good coaching is well-grounded in the fundamentals of the Greater Game. That explains, largely, why so many football stars are considered excellent officer material.

The young men of our country who enter combat service face the problem of toughening up, not only the body but also the mind. Military authorities must indoctrinate soldiers and sailors into purposeful wartime thinking, as well as train their bodies for the realities of war. To achieve this, there should be on the part of every young man a thorough familiarity with bruising body contact. This body contact is imperative. It accustoms the man's head, torso and legs to the shock of physical collision and, by repetitious experiences, adjusts his mind to acceptance of these shocks.

Contrary to the popular belief, the majority of young Americans are not by nature and inclination a part of what is called the body-contact group. Approximately only 20 per cent would qualify. The remaining 80 per cent of our young men might be classed as members of the non-body contact group, which doesn't enjoy the clash of bodies. These play baseball, tennis or golf.

This dislike for body contact has nothing to do with courage. And while there is no limitations on courage, there are definite limits to what courage can accomplish without adequate training and preparation. Football has demonstrated often the futility of courage without the proper complements. The same holds true for war. Lacking proper conditioning in the muscles of the neck, abdomen, arms and legs, the soldier is unprepared for fighting at close quarters. Because he lacks special development of the neck muscles, a solid blow may snap back the head of a soldier and there is a brief moment of unconsciousness. If he rarely has taken body shocks, he can not draw on past experiences, which would indicate why the blow affected him as it did. But let this same soldier, courageous to the 'nth degree, condition himself through football or boxing, and he will accustom himself to shock. He develops the proper psychology toward violence. Many times on the football field you have seen the 220-pound tackle dive through the air and bring down a halfback weighing no more than 150 pounds. The fans in the stands wonder how the little man can stand up under this punishment. How he jumps to his feet immediately and lines up for the next play. Experience. Experience in violence. He is physically and mentally poised when he faces this body contact and knows what to expect.

Listen to what an officer in the navy's division of aviation training has to say about football in particular and sports in general in connection with the war. This is an excerpt from a letter written by Lieut. W. B. Bayless to a physical education group.

"In our three months training period we hope to take young men from civilian life and instill in them a fighting spirit, a physical conditioning and love for the service which will make them ultimately aviators unequalled anywhere in the world. The Pre-Flight Induction Centers further will be a means of eliminating young men who definitely show that they will be a handicap to our already crowded Flight Training schools.

"The 'Will to Win' spirit is considered the most important factor for a successful naval aviator. Therefore, it will not be necessary for good aviators to be supermen from a physical standpoint as long as they have that competitive spirit which is developed on the field of sport.

"We have noted with alarm the large number of small schools that have a false idea of patriotism as shown by their discontinuing all competitive athletics. Certainly, if such a program of cancellation became widespread, it could easily have a disastrous result.

There, in a nutshell, is just about all the justification football ever has needed.
